

ABOUT

Cornel Racoveanu is a security professional and researcher specializing in the prevention and countering of organized crime and cross-border security, with expertise in international security and intelligence studies. Drawing on extensive experience within international organizations and law enforcement agencies, his work focuses on the strategic and operational implications of transnational organized crime, hybrid threats, and the evolving challenges to regional and global security.

His areas of expertise include risk analysis and assessment related to organized crime, international police and judicial cooperation, intelligence and information sharing, as well as the development of mechanisms aimed at strengthening the security of external borders. His academic research explores the dynamics of transnational threats, international security cooperation, intelligence-sharing mechanisms, and the integration of these dimensions into national and European security strategies.

Cornel Racoveanu builds upon his operational experience in threat analysis, the prevention and countering of organized crime, and international cooperation through research focused on the development of effective security policies and strategies. His work promotes integrated approaches to enhancing institutional resilience and strengthening national and European security in response to complex and emerging threats.
